That this House, while agreeing that the Government must not allow the implementation period to end without a deal for the UK's future relationship with the European Union, declines to give the European Union (Future Relationship) Bill a second reading because it implements the first free trade deal in history to put up new barriers to trade that will harm UK businesses and impose additional costs on UK consumers, ends the mutual recognition of professional qualifications, deprives the UK's financial services sector of passporting rights, deprives UK police of direct, real-time access to EU-wide law enforcement databases, ends the UK's participation in the Erasmus+ student exchange programme, does not provide a grace period for businesses to prepare for and adapt to the new rules, and will result in lower economic growth and less revenue for key public services, because it therefore does not meet the undertakings given to the people of the UK by the Prime Minister and other members of the Government, and because the Government has failed to provide sufficient opportunity for Parliament or the public to scrutinise it properly.

Caroline Lucas

That this House declines to give a Second Reading to the European Union (Future Relationship) Bill because it seeks to implement a deal that breaks countless promises this Government made at the 2019 General Election and both during and since the Brexit referendum in June 2016, does not have the public's explicit informed consent, ends the right to freely travel, live and work in 27 other EU countries, fails to secure access to the Erasmus Programme, will inflict economic hardship on the UK, fails to include the trade in services that are the UK's main export to the EU and that will be significantly damaged by the end of free movement, increases technical barriers and costs for UK businesses, risks exposing UK consumers to lower quality food and reduced animal welfare standards, and undermining hard won protections for the environment and for workers' rights, diminishes the UK's global influence, cuts the ties that were designed to bring nations together to build peace out of the ruins of the Second World War, and fails to reflect that the nature of the climate and ecological emergencies require the closest co-operation and partnership, cross border working and for a shared and safe future to be the utmost priority.

That this House declines to give a Second Reading to the European Union (Future Relationship) Bill because, in implementing the Trade and Cooperation Agreements between the United Kingdom and European Union, it will cause significant harm to every sector of the economy and society of the countries of the United Kingdom; believes that the Bill and the Agreements do not respect the different outcomes of the Brexit referendum in the different countries of the United Kingdom, or the compromise arrangements for a future relationship proposed by the Scottish Government in its Scotland's Place in Europe documents, and do not even live up to pledges made by those now in Her Majesty's Government, including the pledges that the UK would have complete control over its fishing waters, that it would remain part of the Erasmus student exchange programme, that mutual recognition of professional qualifications would continue and that the UK would be a safer place through enhanced security cooperation; regrets that Her Majesty's Government has sought to conclude and implement these Agreements despite the major challenges posed to global wellbeing by the coronavirus pandemic, and has brought forward the Bill without indications from the devolved governments that they will recommend their legislatures agree Legislative Consent Motions, particularly as the Bill seeks to make provisions affecting devolved competencies; and believes that the Agreements demonstrate that no third-party relationship with the European Union can bring the same benefits as full membership, which is what Scotland voted for in 2016, and looks forward to a day in the near future when Scotland will have the opportunity to choose to become a full, independent Member State of the European Union.

The Speaker will put all questions necessary to bring proceedings on Second Reading (so far as not previously concluded) to a conclusion at 2.30pm.
